Shahana Rajani

and Aziza Ahmad

Lines That World a River is artist Shahana Rajani's (b. 1987, Karachi, Pakistan) first solo exhibition in Europe, with contributions from Ustad Abdul Aziz, Abdul Sattar and Aziza Ahmad. The exhibition has developed from Rajani's research into the Indus River delta and the practices of the people who consider the delta their home. As the world continues to be changed through human intervention and the resultant effects on the global ecology and climate, there is an impact on the communities and wetlands that depend upon the life-nourishing outflow of the river into the sea.

Since the 19th century, colonial attempts to fix and control the river have resulted in the construction of endless dams, barrages and canals. As the river is channelled and redistributed upcountry for agriculture, it no longer reaches the delta. Without the river, the coastal wetlands are left vulnerable to rising sea levels and catastrophic erosion. As the land is submerged and eaten away, many people are forced to move to cities like Karachi. So far, over 1.2 million people have been displaced and 4.2 million acres of land lost to the sea. While state officials view the outflow of river into sea as wasted water, fisher communities of the delta understand the meeting of the river and the sea as a sacred union that gives birth to all life and land. As rivers are disrupted, elders explain that the sea is coming forward in search of its beloved, the river.

The body of work in this exhibition centres practices and lineages of drawing and painting through which coastal communities in Pakistan remain connected to sacred ecologies of rivers and sea amidst the violence and erasure of infrastructure and the climate emergency. In Arabic the word for universe, alam, and the word for knowledge, ilm, share their origin in the word, alamah, a mark. To make a mark, to draw a line, is a way of knowing the world.
